Great one.

Gets my vote for quote of the year:

The world does not make room for the fragile.

Interesting stuff...I like this quote:

Why do you make music?

Itâ€™s first and foremost a therapeutic form where I can release all anger, stress, conflicts. I never make music for someone else. I donâ€™t know how to do it and I have no interest in it. Some make songs for their partners or whatever but I have some sort of block where I just canâ€™t do it. Its an emotional process and I am not very comfortable playing my music for anyone else, simply because I think it always would sound like shit to all people that listen to it. And it probably does to some, I just donâ€™t care. The internet is great in the way you can put out your music there and just let it slowly die, it becomes a graveyard for sounds (and all other digital media for that matter). I also donâ€™t know why and how I should perform in a band constellation, Iâ€™m not much of a musician in that sense. Iâ€™m a techy kind of guy who likes to make sounds and mess around with gear. There are thousands of us. The big difference is I like it so much I have made it my profession.

I vote for sticky in everyone's brain actually - the article is THAT good.

This man is so humble and lacking hypocrisy that after reading the interview my machines got enveloped in an aura of wisdom.

Respect.

what a great interview, really encouraging to be free, individual, seeking innovation.

so many cool ideas in there .. like the excellent practise of using a drum machine as a synth, and the synthesizer as a drum machine ... perfect; MD and MnM switch roles ..

also, Daniel's opinion of computers really helped me to plan on using all-hardware when mixing visuals alongside mixing audio with elektron gear.
